A fictional East Harlem resident uses a neighborhood disability resource center and attends its peer support group. A home attendant assists the resident in an apartment building and coordinates appointment reminders with a resource navigator. The resource center hosts the peer group and helps the resident organize access needs.

A mobility scheduling office makes decisions outside those immediate settings. Its booking rules determine whether the resident can reach the resource center on time. State home care reimbursement policy shapes the attendant's available hours and the support that can be provided at home. This classroom case is fabricated and contains no information about a real person or organization.
